

New York, N.Y. – The College Board today shared how it will make the SAT available in school and out of school as soon as the public health situation allows.

The not-for-profit organization’s top priorities are the health and safety of students and educators. Public health officials have made clear it currently is not safe to gather students in one place, and many states have closed school for the rest of the academic year. As such, the College Board will not be able to administer the SAT as planned on June 6, 2020.

The College Board will ensure students have opportunities to take the SAT to make up for the lost administrations this spring, giving them opportunities to show their strengths and continue on the path to college.

“We know students and educators are worried about how the coronavirus may disrupt the college admissions process, and we want to do all we can to help alleviate that anxiety during this very demanding time,” said College Board CEO David Coleman. “Our first principle with the SAT and all our work must be to keep families and students safe. The second principle is to make the SAT as widely available as possible for students who wish to test, regardless of the economic or public health 7,

Almost all of College Board state partners and many of its district interest in providing SAT administrations during the school day later this fall.

_____, have already made announcements regarding fall testing. This is an important opportunity for the many students who take the SAT for free as part of state- and large district-sponsored programs.

admissions. Like the pencil-and-paper test, a digital, remote version of the SAT

Contact Us

Media inquiries should be directed to the College Board Communications Office. Call 212-713-8052 or _____.

For all other questions, please see our